Investing in Residential Real Estate

Investing in residential real estate can be one of the most satisfying ways to create your own personal financial freedom.

Unfortunately, it is also full of many shortfalls which many people fail to understand or realise. When buying residential real estate, most real estate agents will quote you a gross rental return on the property. What this figure doesn't take into account are the outgoings of the property.

These include rates, land tax, insurance, body corporate fees, lighting of common areas, real estate agents' management and letting fees and of course, the big one often forgotten about is maintenance. Always think of maintenance over the longer period - for example 5 years. Calculate into this figure the replacement cost of carpets, curtains, light fittings, maybe a hot water cylinder, any external painting that may need to be done and also internal painting.

Generally speaking you will find tenanted properties need refurbishing every 5 to 7 years.

As a general rule of thumb, the total of these outgoings represent about one third of the gross income and this is before you allow for your mortgage costs.

When purchasing residential investment property, make sure you allow for all of these outgoings - it is better to overestimate what they are going to cost you. There are then no unpleasant surprises one or two years down the track which could often force you to sell the property as you can't afford to keep it. If investing in real estate, a good qualified real estate valuer will be able to help you in estimating the outgoings on buying. The small fee you pay them could be worth thousands to you further down the track.
