Budget walks a fine line between tax reform and housing delivery

Article by Property Australia via the Property Council of Australia, May 13 2026

The 2026-27 Federal Budget lands at a delicate moment for housing supply, investment and confidence.

For months, the Property Council has been clear on what Australia needs: more homes delivered at speed and at scale, backed by policy settings that attract capital, streamline approvals and unlock infrastructure. This Budget responds to that challenge in parts, but it also steps firmly into more uncertain territory.

The Government has announced significant changes to the way housing investment is taxed. The 50 per cent capital gains tax discount will be replaced with indexation, alongside the introduction of a minimum 30 per cent tax on capital gains from 1 July 2027. At the same time, negative gearing will be limited so that only new housing can access full settings, with established housing facing tighter rules.

Tax policy does not operate in isolation. It shapes behaviour, particularly for long term capital. Housing investment decisions are made over years, and what matters is not only the incentive at the start of a project, but also the treatment of that investment at the exit.

This matters at a time when the sector is already carrying significant pressure. Labour costs remain elevated, material prices are volatile, and borrowing costs continue to weigh on project feasibility. Margins are tight, and in many cases, the decision to proceed or not proceed with a project rests on relatively small changes to risk and return.

That is why the preservation of more favourable treatment for new housing is so important.

The real test will be how investors respond.

Alongside these tax changes, the Budget includes practical measures that go directly to longstanding industry advocacy.

A central feature is the $2 billion Local Infrastructure Fund, delivered over four years from 2026–27, which lifts total Commonwealth investment in housing enabling infrastructure to around $6 billion.

This funding will support local governments and utility providers to deliver essential infrastructure (roads, water, power and sewerage) that is required before a home can be built. It is expected to help unlock up to 65,000 homes across the country. This is where policy meets delivery.

Too often, projects stall after planning approval because the enabling infrastructure is not in place. Investment in this “last mile” remains one of the most effective ways to accelerate new housing supply, particularly in outer metropolitan and growth areas.

The Budget also commits $500 million to streamline environmental approvals, including funding for bilateral agreements with states and territories and improved systems to reduce duplication and delays.

These reforms, alongside broader measures to improve productivity, reduce compliance costs and create more consistent national systems, are steps in the right direction.

Taken together, they reflect elements of what the industry has consistently called for: fewer bottlenecks, faster approvals and targeted investment to unlock supply.

But the interaction between these measures and the new tax settings will ultimately determine the outcome.

Encouraging investment in new housing requires alignment across all policy levers. Infrastructure funding, planning reform and tax policy must pull in the same direction. If one part of the system works against another, the net effect on supply can be diminished.

The coming months will be critical in understanding how this balance plays out.
